NO-dependent apoptosis has been observed in several experimental models and certain clinical pathologies 101876, Induction of apoptosis by NO is associated with a decrease in the concentration of cardiolipin, decreased activity of the mitochondrial electron transport chain, and release of mitochondrial cytochrome c into the cytosol. However, some cell types, such as endothelial cells from the microvasculature, are extremely resistant to the induction of apoptosis by NO and low concentrations of NO provide protection from apoptotic cell death in various cell types by inhibiting certain caspases. High intracellular glutathione levels are associated with increased resistance to NO-mediated apoptosis. Whether and how these ROS contribute to the induction of cell death depends on the signaling and execution pathways that are activated. This process induces proliferation or cell death depending on the condition of the ROS-producing cell. These ROS induce a number of defense genes or drive cells into apoptosis. A study of the infection of Arabidopsis leaves by avirulent Pseudomonas syringae revealed that the local primary oxidative burst leads to subsequent secondary microbursts in distant leaves and contributes thereby to the development of a state of systemic acquired resistance SAR. Activation of SAR is associated with the expression of several gene families, i.
